To Whom It May Concern,

It is with great pleasure that I write this letter in recognition of Musica Universalis, a youth-led initiative dedicated to making quality music education accessible to underserved children, and its Presidents, Mr. Mrityunjay Gupta and Mr. Ved Rathi.

As the Founder of Soul of Symphony – The Piano Conservatoire, an institution dedicated to advancing music education in Rajasthan, and a regional representative of Trinity College London, I have long believed that musical education should extend beyond conventional classrooms. It is this shared philosophy that makes our partnership with Musica Universalis particularly meaningful.

Under the leadership of Mrityunjay and Ved, Musica Universalis has grown into an impressive international initiative, providing free music education to over 5,000 underserved children across six countries, in collaboration with more than five NGOs, including Naya Sawera, Aashray Care Home, and Impact Foundation. What distinguishes their work is not merely its scale, but their commitment to extending musical opportunities to communities where access to instruments, trained instructors, and structured music education is often limited.

Our partnership with Musica Universalis has been especially rewarding in translating access to music education into tangible academic achievement. Students trained through the initiative have gone on to successfully pass and earn certifications in Trinity College London music examinations, as well as Indian music qualifications such as the Bhatkhande music examinations. Watching children who once had limited access to formal musical training achieve recognition through established examination systems is a testament to the quality, consistency, and lasting impact of Musica Universalis's educational efforts.

I particularly commend Mrityunjay Gupta and Ved Rathi for their leadership, initiative, and dedication. Building and coordinating an educational initiative across multiple NGOs and countries requires considerable organizational ability, perseverance, and a genuine commitment to service. Their willingness to devote their time and musical experience to the benefit of others is commendable, especially at such a young age.

I strongly recommend both Mrityunjay and Ved for recognition of their contributions to music education and community service, and look forward to seeing their initiative continue to flourish.

Sincerely,

Pradeep Chaturvedi
Founder, Soul of Symphony – The Piano Conservatoire
Regional Representative, Trinity College London
Jaipur, Rajasthan, India